Changes in the Recycling World

Do you know what happens to your recycling after it leaves your home? While you may just toss your bottle, can, or paper in the bin and continue on your way, you probably haven't given much thought to where it ends up. WasteDive.com reported one-third of the United States' recyclables are exported to different countries, China once being the largest customer in the industry. In fact, according to the article "5 charts that show the trade flow effects of China's import policies" written by Cole Rosengren and Edwin Lopez and published on WasteDive.com, "Modern residential recycling programs in the U.S. were built on the back of high Chinese demand, fueled in part by low-cost labor." But, this all began to change in July of 2017, when China filed with the World Trade Organization (WTO) their intent to stop accepting 24 kinds of solid waste imports by the end of the year. China stated the filing was to address the concerns of pollution occurring to China's environment and the effect it was having on people's health along with growing labor concerns. As China began to implement this stricter ban, a handful of Southeastern Asian countries began to pick up China's slack, such as Malaysia, Indonesia, and Vietnam. However, these countries are not viable as a long-term solution because they are not equipped to keep up with the volume of scrap they receive. In fact, in May of 2018, Vietnam temporarily stopped accepting scrap recycling which resulted in other countries following suit. Along with not being equipped to handle the amount of product being shipped to these countries, they also have "...no regulatory framework to ensure plastic waste is processed in an environmentally friendly way," reports Waste Dive.

So, how does this affect you, the customer? In July of 2018, the City of Robinson began offering recycling services as an option through a newly signed contract with Waste Management. The ripple effect of China's ban on import began to hit here locally right as this new service was to begin. To prevent a rate increase to the customers, this early on in the new service, Waste Management negotiated an agreement with Sunbright Recycling which required the elimination of glass and plastics numbered (3) three through (7) seven from their curbside recycling program.

As we make our way into 2019, the United States is continuing to see the effects on cities nationwide. Recently, Sunbright Recycling informed Waste Management they would be increasing their fees from $25/ton to $70/ton for recycling brought to them. This would mean a $.44 increase per month to residential customers bills, but with service being so new to customers City Council approved to waive the rate increase to customers until July when the contract allows for annual rate adjustments based on Consumer Price Index (CPI).

As the United States, as a whole, continues to seek solutions to the impact China's ban has caused, there will continue to be uncertainty on the continued effects of the local market. In the meantime, the City will continue to work closely with Waste Management to provide reasonably priced services to customers as the market continues to change.

Affects of the Change

A Quick Glimpse on How this is Affecting Other Texas Cities

- Rates increase in El Paso.
- Texarkana fears local recycling could be in danger due to high contamination rates.
- Kilgore is raising rates due to a spike in monthly processing costs.
- San Angelo and Republic are rethinking their contract.

Changes & Solutions:

- San Antonio doubles recycling contamination fees
- El Paso will step up its education efforts with a goal of cutting current contamination rates in half.
- Oak Ridge North approved a rate increase which could go back down if they stop collecting glass.
- Four neighborhoods in Harris County's Municipal Utility District 119 will lose all curbside recycling service due to rising costs.
- San Angelo will be removing mixed paper and mixed plastics from the city's program to avoid a change in price for residents.
